Recent studies have found that natural resources and civil war are highly correlated. Yet the causal mechanisms behind the correlation are not well understood, in part because data on civil wars is scarce and of poor quality. In this article I examine thirteen recent civil wars to explore the mechanisms behind the resource-conflict correlation.

Natural resources have a determinant role in conflicts. They can in fact motivate the initiation, duration, or finalisation of a conflict. Paul Collier, Director of the Centre for the Study of African Economies at The University of Oxford, has portrayed resources as a main cause and perpetuation of war.

The influence of transportation on natural resources. Initially, transportation's role with respect to natural resources was that it allowed resources to be developed or used. Too much of this occurred, and it has resulted in resources being misused, overused, or exploited as well.

Transportation also has made it possible to strip forests of trees, with or without regard for environmental effects on the cleared land or adjacent surface waters.

The discussion of the curse of natural resources in the Cameroon raises the issue of whether or not natural resources wealth, specifically oil, might influence political institutions as well as economics. The mechanisms we proposed for the resource curse, not surprisingly, worked through politics. But it did take political institutions as given. Might oil or more generally natural resource wealth lead to institutional deterioration in the political sphere?

Natural resources are woven into every aspect of our lives. From the air we breathe to the water we drink, we rely on Earth's natural resources to survive. We use some of these resources in their natural state for food, shelter and clothing; others become products that enhance our standard of living.
